

SOCIAL MEDIA INTERN — Job Description

We're looking for a part-time, paid Social Media Intern at Education Post, and we've got two questions for you:

1. Do you love to tell stories through social media—whether it's longform blogs, shortform tweets, or going visual on Insta and Snap?
2. Do you think all kids deserve an equal opportunity at a great education, no matter their zip code or the color of their skin?

If you answer yes, then you might have what it takes. We're looking for a good writer and proofreader who is detail-oriented, creative and collaborative, with great instincts for what works on social media. You'll get to work with our awesome digital team, learning everything there is to know about publishing and amplifying a blog with national reach and influence.

ABOUT EDUCATION POST

We're a non-partisan, nonprofit communications organization, and we want better public schools, especially for low-income and minority students.

- We believe in high standards for every student.
- We believe in holding ourselves accountable to those standards.
- We believe in providing quality school options for every family.

However, big change is hard. There is strong resistance to honestly evaluating our schools and teachers, and many communities still lack high-quality public school choices. Meanwhile, most parents, teachers and students believe we need reform—as long as it's done right.

At Education Post, we want a better conversation. We're elevating the voices of those who have gone unheard for too long. Those in the reasonable middle. Those whose families stand to lose the most if our schools don't get better, and fast.

Under the leadership of Peter Cunningham, who most recently served as Assistant Education Secretary in the Obama administration, we also partner with like-minded organizations, civic leaders and school districts to provide strategic support wherever we can be helpful.

And, by the way, we're located in Chicago's Wicker Park neighborhood above a really good taco place.

HOW TO APPLY

If you think this is you, then send your application to jobs@educationpost.org. Make sure to include your resume and a cover letter tailored to this specific position. We'll be in touch if it seems like a good fit.